"Get There Quick"

A POETIC GEM of early memory, brief and to the point, has hung on memory's wall for a long while—and today is revived by a military secret.

The poem—or, perhaps, mere doggerel—reads:

"The golden apple of our lives hangs where the leaves are thick; If we would get that apple down We've got to get there quick."

And always haste has been the winning force—except when speed was out of control. Thus the problem of the ages has been to master speed. Today control seems to have been brought almost—if not quite—to perfection. In a Florida state Monday an aerial war device went into the air is reported to have attained a rate of 2,700 miles per hour. And that would seem to be fast enough—but it's not the limit. A smaller device, travelling in space from the same experiment, is reported to have attained a speed of probably 5,000 miles per hour. Certainly that ought to be fast enough. Around the earth five times in a single day—who could imagine that speed!

"Backward, turn backward, O, time in your flight, And make me a child again just for tonight!"
